Compulsory REVISION comments	The manuscript appears to be fine, although it would be better to refer the literature review under a separate topic.
Minor REVISION comments	The model shows that how the easing of the labor market promotes both capital and labor migration from urban to rural areas, as well as increases in agricultural output and productivity. However, a decrease in capital market distortion falls short of its desired result and lowers agricultural output.
Optional/General comments	Small-scale agriculture is typical in poor countries. Rural areas split the agricultural producer service sector in order to address this problem, which supports labor division in agricultural production and acts as a form of link between individual farmers.
