|-------------------------------------|--|---|
| Compulsory REVISION comments | The study is hinged on the hypothesis that, the two black men, Jo's husband and Godzilla, in the two texts use sadomasochism to assert their hyper sexuality and as a medium of revenge and resistance (against past black and white relational unfairness) on their white spouses who exercise stoicism to express their frustrations and emotional attachments to their virulent black sexual partners. The methodology employed in the analysis is an interpretative, comparative and contrastive one. The paper comes out with the findings that Jo's husband and Godzilla brandish their sadomasochism not only to assert their psyched hyper sexuality on white women whom they had been deprived of sexually for centuries, but to also avenge themselves for past black dehumanisation by callous and racist colonialists and imperialists. In conclusion, domestic violence is one of the discomfoting and shameful phenomena that continues to be sporadically spilt in the post-modernist era in the British society in particular, and the world in general. | |
| Minor REVISION comments | Only the references, most of them are too old. If it possible the references should be more newest. | |
