Optional/General comments	The most prevalent social issues relating to health include unemployment, lack of access to food and shelter, a lack of social support, and illiteracy. In order to address these socioeconomic determinants of health, healthcare providers must take a number of proactive measures, such as screening patients. The government and healthcare industries must make investments more strategically so that the most vulnerable people in society can get healthcare services that are accessible and affordable. If these people struggle with government schemes, neither health insurance nor medical advancements can save their lives.
