For this the author used an analytic observational method with a case-control design and non-probability sampling and purposive sampling techniques with the sample. The author concludes that the incidence of pulmonary TB in fisherman and smoked fish industry communities is influenced by environment exposed to smoke from smoking fish and window opening habit. This is following the emphasis of Nightingale's environmental theory stating that pure air and lighting are included in the main components influencing the environment. References are recent and title is also suitable. The paper can be published.
