Health care professionals working in an Intensive Care Unit of a hospital are exposed to high level of stress ( physical, emotional and psychological) resulting into bad safety culture, poor standard of patients care and depression. It has been found that long and demanding work hours, the burden of paperwork and legal matters, the disruption of work-life balance, the complexity of shared decision-making, and the high expectations placed on both patients and carers are some of the factors contributing to the extreme levels of stress experienced by healthcare professionals working in ICU of a hospital.The Intensive care Unit is a very demanding environment and important unit of a hospital linked to high levels of stress among health care professionals. Stress management strategies are crucial and should be customised to the causes and contributing factors of occupational stress among health care professional in an Intensive Care Unit of a hospital. Multidisciplinary scientific research,innovative techniques and conducive environment are urgently required in this important health sector in order to protect health of health care professionals working in ICU and also to provide better health care facility to patients admitted in ICU of a hospital . 2.
