The manuscript is important for the scientific community as it addresses the significant and understudied relationship between relationship breakup and psychological outcomes, specifically impulsivity, aggression, and suicidal ideation among young adults. The findings contribute valuable insights that could inform intervention and support strategies for individuals experiencing the aftermath of a relationship breakup. 2. The title of the article is suitable as it clearly reflects the focus of the research on "Impulsivity, Aggression, and Suicidal Ideation Among Young Adults with the History of Relationship Breakup." It effectively communicates the key variables and the population under investigation. 3. The abstract provides a comprehensive overview of the research, summarizing the objectives, methods, results, and implications effectively. It provides a clear snapshot of the study, allowing readers to understand the purpose and key findings. 4. The subsections and structure of the manuscript appear appropriate. The introduction provides context, the objectives are clearly stated, methods are well-detailed, results are presented with relevant figures, and the discussion interprets the findings in the context of existing literature. This structure enhances the clarity and flow of the manuscript. 5. The manuscript appears scientifically correct in its approach, methods, and analysis. The use of established assessment tools, statistical methods, and a reasonable sample size adds credibility to the study. The linear regression analysis strengthens the exploration of the relationships between the variables. 6. References is okay. Overall, the manuscript is well-executed, providing valuable insights into an important area of research. The findings have the potential to contribute significantly to the understanding of the psychological consequences of relationship breakup among young adults.
