Women generally view corruption as less harmful than men, who perceive it as more severe and are more aware of its prevalence. There are also notable variations in how men and women perceive the ACC's performance and specific corruption offences, though not in bribery perceptions. Gender-sensitive policies are crucial for more effective anti-corruption strategies, acknowledging these diverse perspectives. "Gender Differences in Perceptions of Corruption: Insights from Bhutan" Yes Yes Using only T test enough to prove hypothesis?
