

Gender frames portrayed in television series: real-life implications towards women

ABSTRACT

This paper sets out to determine the gender frames portrayed in television series. The rationale behind the study is to ascertain and examine its real-life implications towards women. Two theoretical frameworks were used: framing theory and cultivation theory. Qualitative content analysis of one popular TV series and focus group discussions were employed as data collection instruments. Findings from the study reveal unequal portrayal between men and women in TV series. The male gender is portrayed as educated, wealthy, and bright, as well as providers and business people who spend a lot of time discussing business and development. The female gender is portrayed as weak and needy, in a narrow range of roles as jobless, with a concentration on the traditional roles of home stay mums and homemakers. More so, they are portrayed as emotionally and economically dependent on men, gossipers who spend a lot of their time sharing their feelings and discussing people. 80% of male respondents said that they perceive women as weak, sex vessels, and dependent. In reflection on cultivation theory, the implication of this kind of portrayal is that in real life, women are treated as weak, needy, second class who sometimes are not involved in important decisions because society sees them as weak and emotional. This further lowers the confidence and self-esteem of women in real life, which causes them to lose many opportunities and remain poor and dependent.

While this study accepts television series' contribution to bringing about social change, it does not forget their negative impact on women through their portrayal. This paper advocates for a more positive portrayal of gender frames in television series to counteract this negative impact.

Keywords: Gender Frames, Portrayal of women, Television series, Female gender, Male gender.

1. INTRODUCTION

Television and television series

Television is among the forces that shape the public both deliberately and unintentionally. Since the 1950s, the media has emerged as the leading actor in forming individuals' ideologies. Past studies show that societal perceptions, attitudes, and values are refined through media exposure (Aromona, 2016).

Television is a media instrument with the most influential power in shaping public opinion on various issues. Society has taken the fact that television programs are shaping the public as they are. Television series, among other television programs, are the ones that capture the highest ratings in broadcasting; at the same time, they contribute more to economic inputs. Moreover, TV series plays a significant role in shaping society; people who spend much time watching TV series tend to perceive the natural world and events just like what they see in Television series (Kasimoglu, 2019).

Television series and the portrayal of gender

Khan and Zaheen (2011) explain that media, especially television, not only represents the leading social morals and ethics but also plays a role in educating people regarding various social issues. The beliefs portrayed by media pass through society and slowly become part of it, and finally, people start practicing the beliefs in real life.

A television series is a regular production on television, whether gratis or through a subscription-based service, with a running time of at least thirty (30) minutes (including commercial advertisement and interstitial programming). Includes, but is not limited to, late-night variety series, daily news series, situation comedies, single-camera comedies, reality series, game shows, morning news, and news magazine shows (Michael, 2023).

Kasimoglu (2019), in his study Portrayal of Perception of Women in Domestic Series and its Comparison with the Real-Life Woman's Figure, from the woman's perspective, found that television series usually portray women as powerless and weak under male dominance with beautiful physical appearance. There are no similarities between these women's images portrayed in television series and real-life figures. The result is that it lowers women's confidence in real life.

Also, Thabete (2008), in her study of the representation of black African women's bodies in soap operas, generations explained that Feminists have always paid attention to how women are portrayed by the media, primarily through television series. This is because the media have always been blamed for presenting women in an unfavorable manner, which results in many adverse effects on society and women specifically. In most television shows, women are objectified or used to promote negative stereotypes about women.

Television and the portrayal of women have always been an issue of debate that surrounds media today. This shows that the sex stereotype is deeply rooted in television series today and does not reflect the reality of women's role in real life and society. In most cases, women in television series are portrayed stereotypically as less confident and not as intelligent as men (Kaul, 2010).

1.1 Statement of the problem

Television is an essential tool for transmitting facts and information, which has a more profound and persuasive impact on viewers. It intends to inform, educate and entertain its audiences (Ahmed, 2012). The portrayal of gender frames in television programs is a sensitive issue in society because it contributes to how society perceives and treats both men and women. The ways that television series portray gender send a particular message to society on how women or men should be perceived and treated.

The framing theory suggests that how something is presented to the audience influences people's choices about how to process that information. Media create these frames by introducing news items and programs (Arowolo, 2017). This means that the ways women and men are framed and presented by television influence people's choices and decisions on how they should perceive and treat men and women in society.

Today, women face different gender problems rooted in the way they are viewed, defined, and perceived by society. Referring to framing theory, this calls for attention to check on how gender is portrayed and framed in popular television shows, especially television series. Therefore, this study seeks to examine gender frames portrayed in television series and understand their influence on how women are perceived by society.

The objectives of this study were to (1) Identify the leading themes portrayed in television series, (2) Identifying different dominant gender frames portrayed in television series, (3) examining how these dominant frames influence people's decisions and attitudes in daily life and (4) Identify the implications of gender frames portrayed in television series towards women.

1.2 Theoretical framework

This study is grounded in two theories: framing theory and cultivation theory. The researcher has chosen these two theories because both explain the ways that television programs influence people's perception in real life. They show the relationship between media and how people go about daily, especially those who spend much time on television. They also explain how media influences what people think and how they think.

Framing theory

The value of understanding specific issues, even understanding a representation of an issue, is implemented through examining specific frames Chong (2007).

Soliman (2021) explains that framing is a procedure that allows the courier to tailor their message or content to a distinct audience. It function as a two-way process that helps analyze and rebuild reality. Framing can also be described as "to select some elements of sensed reality and make them more notable in a communicating text, in a manner that encourage a particular issue depiction, causal understanding, principled evaluation, and treatment suggestion for the item described". Applying this theory to the prospect of this study, the communicators will be the screenwriters and directors. They can control viewers' perceptions of women's issues by framing them in their daily routines. If the communicators

Comment [a1]: Theoretical and literature review can be merge in one section chapter believe in women's power and rights, they will focus on specific traits and aspects and present them in specific frames that would be promoted through television. If they do not believe in women's power and rights, they could present them through traditional, stereotypical frames or frames that would undermine women's status. (Soliman, 2021).

Cultivation theory

Gerbner (1986) at the University of Pennsylvania, under the Cultural Indicator project, developed the Cultivation theory and suggested that television cultivates concepts of social reality. For those who spend much time on television, it becomes the leading source of information, and they are strongly influenced by how television frames their worldview and perception. On the other hand, those who do not spend much time watching television or light viewers seek information from alternate sources besides television and hold different worldviews. First-order effects are general beliefs about the everyday world; second-order effects are specific attitudes towards those beliefs.

Shrum (2017), in the study of Cultivation Theory: Effects and Underlying Processes, explains that cultivation theory has three components, which are entangled: media institutions, message production, and message effects on viewers. In general, it explains the relationship between the time viewers spend on television and its impact on viewers (in this regard, it impacts the belief that these viewers will have about the natural world). The primary hypothesis of cultivation theory is that the more people watch television, the more their views about the natural world will reflect the messages they see on television. Television's storytelling function in drama, series, or movies is compelling. This is why television is among the powerful tool that contributes to normalizing and promoting gender problems as it changes peoples' perception towards gender violence. They see it as a normal part of life. Cultivation theory suggests that people who spend more time on television are more likely to perceive the natural world as depicted on the programs they watch (Stacks, 2015).

1.3 Literature review

Television and the portrayal of gender frames

Although the representation of women in television drama series is currently better than before, women are always presented negatively through dialogues or actions. Women are always presented as irrational, sensitive, emotional, dependent, or indecisive, while men are always presented as rational, intelligent, independent, and competitive (Ibrahim, 2017).

Dominant gender frames portraying women in television series

Television portrayal of women in series results from pre-determined gender stereotypes from societal values. However, at the same time, television portrayal of women intensifies stereotypes in society, and it affects how society perceives women and how women perceive themselves. Media portrayal of women in different programs results from dominant societal values and behaviors. Himani (2015) explains that the media's portrayal of women, whether deliberately or unintentionally, is bolded from the real-life environment and assumptions. This has a significant impact on adolescents and the young generation in general.

Most television dramas that portray women rarely frame them as rational, active, and essential because of their dependent, romantic, and submissive personalities. Instead, they tend to emphasize food, fashion, and furnishing. Therefore, these television programs need reorientation to become more future and development-oriented (Ibrahim, 2017).

Kaul (2010) explains that women are framed in television according to pre-determined stereotypes that exist in society. These stereotypes are vivid and evident in how women are portrayed on television. For example, women are portrayed as domestic helpers, wives, or mothers who are supposed to remain in family roles and responsibilities. In contrast, men are portrayed as employed, competitive, and intelligent. Television series around male sexism create boundaries for women not to aim beyond a loving husband, children, and a beautiful home. Women are mostly portrayed as glamorous beings whose external appearance is their only asset. Women's compromising and sacrificing role in television series is highlighted as it does not threaten the patrilineal system. The outcome is that women are affected the most by these television series simply because they are watching more series than men.

Although the situation is not as extreme as before, the gendered framing of both male and female characters in TV dramas remains polarized, showing the dominant social significance of maleness. Women are usually related to words such as emotional, prudent, gentle, submissive and sensitive; conversely, while men, sensible, impulsive, ruthless, self-dependent and bold (Razkane, 2021).

Foutou (2000) explains that women are mostly portrayed as tall, slim, and "conventionally beautiful." They are also portrayed as friendly and have happy personalities, without much intelligence. A lovely figure (relating to the relevant geographical and cultural location) is necessary to measure a woman's worth in the show. Research shows that overweighted actresses tend to receive negative comments from other male characters about their bodies, and "80% of these comments are followed by canned audience Laughter".

Ingham (2007) adds that in terms of the importance of family life, most female characters in TV dramas are set in domestic situations. Their eventual life accomplishment is supposed to be getting married and having children because the home setting is where women's "capability" is highly valued. Different from marital status, female characters' professional lives are usually ignored, or more often, they are portrayed as housewives who take care of children and family chores every day but are not ambitious at all in building a career. Even if women work, they are often shown on TV in traditionally feminine jobs, such as teachers, secretaries and nurses.

Implications of the ways female gender is framed on television

Swift (2013), in a Special Report: Gender in the Media; Who Makes the News, has explained that women will be perceived and treated as abused if the media portrays them as weak, indecisive, unskilled, and have a low contribution. Media shape how people see and perceive life, so stereotypical and distorted representations of women in the media influence low self-esteem in women and disparity. When a woman is constantly seen in media programs as weak, real-life displays of boldness and courage from women will be perceived as arrogance and pride. As a result, most women who try to show their strength in real life are labeled as cold and not submissive.

Khan and Zaheen's study, Portrayal of Women by Star plus Soap Operas: A Feministic Perspective (2010) explains that Liberal feminists suggest that women in television series are not portrayed as wise and sage characters. They are shown as beautiful and delicate but lacking intelligence and the capability to make and take a decision. Liberal feminists are critical regarding such portrayal.

Objectification of women on television series

Objectification of women is when women are reduced to a mere commodity, judged by attributes of their bodies rather than who they are as a person. From the twentieth century, in television, Objectification of women became an increasingly growing tendency. Media, especially television, has always used unreal images of women's physical appearance, body image, behavioral standards, and beauty (Sen, 2019).

In today's society, women are constantly being over-sexualized and objectified when it comes to entertainment, specifically movies and series. The University of Southern California's School for Communication and Journalism studied how each gender is portrayed on screen. After viewing the 100 most-grossing movies from 2009, they found that females are more likely than males to be shown in sexually appealing clothing. The study also showed that teenage females from the ages of 13-20 years old are just as likely as adult women to be portrayed as over-sexualized characters. Women in later ages are less likely to be portrayed as sexual characters (Colin-Thome, 2017). Objectifying a gender is the worst thing in humankind. The impossible beauty standards which showcase on television that women should be thin and fair and should only be homemakers and do not deserve to have a career of their own create negative impacts on society, especially on women. For years, people have applied the things that they see on screen. This is one of the reasons that are making the situation of women worse and more miserable. Many of the females are starving themselves to get that beauty standard set by the industry. They eat less and exercise beyond their boundaries to get that model look. Women in the media are either the best examples or the worst. Though many women have started to showcase the real power of females, many females still accept the stereotypical Portrayal of women from the media. Young girls look out to one person as a role model. If it is from the entertainment industry, numerous things affect their thinking and raise problems, such as eating disorders, sexualizing clothes and their overall psychological well-being. Media is everywhere, and the Portrayal of women has been a controversial topic since the beginning. The industry portrays women in a way that is unattainable and unrealistic, which leads to depression and drug intake among the women in the industry. Women are shown as the so-called 'Perfectionists' instead of showing diversity, self Love or acceptance of their flaws (Womenite, 2020).

In the media entertainment industry, it has been proven that a female actress who plays a hypersexual character will make more money than a female actress who doesn't. The men in charge, the ones who get the final say, don't care about depth; they care about money, so women do not have a choice but to play along. Women who play sexual, attractive characters sell more movies (Colin-Thome, 2017).

The negative impact of media objectification of women, mainly on television series, is that it has critical consequences on the cognitive fitness of women and girls. They perceive their physical beauty as a measure of the amount of love and the power they should receive. It also puts pressure on them to conform to usual beauty standards. It results in women constantly criticizing their bodies. They compulsively monitor their own body's outward appearance and become overly concerned about how others may perceive their physical appearance (Sen, 2019).

2. METHODOLOGY

Television is a complex subject to study. It is everywhere, and its influence on viewers is tricky to determine. Television also involves many interconnected elements of contemporary life that interact with one another in recognized and unrecognizable ways. This study aims to reveal and examine gender frames portrayed in television series and to understand their influence on how women are perceived by society.

In an attempt to examine the complexity of television series, various tools were employed.

2.1 Content analysis

Content analysis was primarily used for this study. Content analysis is proper for studying television series because they are narrative.

2.2 Focus group discussion

This was also used as a method of data collection to identify the most preferred themes and frames and determine how these dominant themes and frames influence people's perceptions and decisions towards women in daily life. The focus group discussion included ten men and ten women. Purposive sampling was used to select respondents who are active television series viewers for this study.

2.3 Research approach

This is a qualitative study; television series are multifaceted programs; for this reason, qualitative analysis was chosen over quantitative. One television series was chosen for this study, which is "Siri za familia" (Family Secrets), 20 episodes of this series were watched and careful notes were taken. Siri za Familia is a popular TV series featuring true stories of different "family secrets" encountered by different African families. It was shot in Dar es Salaam, Tanzania, and Aired on East African Television.

Episodes were examined to identify different leading and dominant gender themes and frames portrayed in this series. Of particular interest are the portrayals of female gender and how women relate to other characters. Also, episodes were examined to check if the portrayals of women and female gender relate to what we witness daily in real life.

2.3 Data Analysis

Various tools were employed to examine the complexity of television series. Narrative analysis was primarily used for this study. Narrative analysis is appropriate for studying television series because they are narrative. Therefore, the researcher focused on narrating episodes from the Siri za familia drama series and stories and experiences shared by respondents to answer the research questions.

3. RESULTS AND DISCUSSION

This study examined the real-life implications of gender frames portrayed in television series towards women. This section will include the results from the data gathered from the Siri za familia series content analysis and focus group discussion. Findings addressing the research objectives show an unequal portrayal of gender frames between female and male genders, which is reflected in different roles, played by men and women in the Siri za familia series.

95% of respondents insisted that there is unequal portrayal and framing between men and women in television series. This is mirrored by different themes that frame men and women. Respondents stressed that the female gender is framed and presented in undignified ways (half naked), weak, violated (beaten and confined), undermined and sometimes portrayed as people who do not have permission to voice their opinion in important family matters.

Women are also portrayed as instruments of pleasure, unstable, and responsible for raising children, and if anything goes wrong with the children, women are the ones to blame, not the husband/father. Respondents further added that women are portrayed as powerless, dependent and always given narrow chances, especially in leadership.

However, the male gender is framed as dignified, strong, stable, and capable of leading society.

3.1 Leading themes portrayed in television series.

Findings through content analysis show that the leading themes portrayed in the Siri za familia series include love and sexual relationships. These themes had sub-themes of betrayals, which were mainly used to make the series more interesting and to keep viewers glued to the screen and anxiously waiting for the next episode. Other leading themes included conflicts, secrets, and skeletons in the cupboard, gender violence, and plans going wrong.

3.2 Dominant gender frames portrayed in Siri Za Familia series

Content analysis from the Siri za familia series confirms that the male gender is framed as serious businessmen who are rich, educated, with exposure, providers, and financially stable. More so, men are portrayed as people who can make essential family decisions without consulting their female partners.

Content analysis also reveals that the female gender in Siri za familia is typically framed as weak, needy and desperate for love from the male gender. It is also framed as sex objects, domestic servants, the weaker sex, wicked mothers-in-law, incompetent in making wise decisions and using what they have, which mainly is their bodies and appearances, to get whatever they want, like material things and relationship partners. More so, the women/female gender is framed as jobless, with a concentration on the traditional roles of stay-at-home moms and homemakers with nothing to offer in development except for a few scenes in which women are portrayed as employed and economically independent.

But even educated, independent women are framed and portrayed as emotionally desperate and needy for love, as they are constantly betrayed by jobless women. This is in line with the literature review, which said that women are generally negatively portrayed in television series. Most television dramas that portray women rarely portray them as rational, active, and essential.

Comment [a2]: The subsection chapter is not needed

Findings from content analysis of Siri za familia also show that the female gender is framed as economically dependent on men and also emotionally dependent in relationships with men with which, without, their life means nothing. This is evident in most of the episodes when women are portrayed crying, complaining that their lives were destroyed and over because their fiancés betrayed them.

On the other hand, findings show that when men meet, they discuss business and development issues, while when women meet, they gossip, discuss other people, and share their feelings.

3.3 Women Objectification

Findings show that women/female gender in television series is objectified, reducing them to their physical appearance and sexual attractiveness as in most episodes; women are praised on their physical appearance and not their mind power. This suggests that women should be valued primarily for their bodies and physical appearance rather than their skills. Women are portrayed as asking for money from their partners to enhance their physical beauty, not development matters.

Its impact towards women includes valuing women based on appearance, which minimizes women's abilities and competence (Nassbaum, 2000). This was found to be true in the Siri za familia series, in which women were objectified, filling stereotypical roles rather than educative and economic roles. In support of this finding, Kellie et al.,(2019), in the study What drives female objectification? explains that objectified Women are perceived as less than fully human, less of a mind for thoughts or decisions and less deserving of moral treatment by others in the society. The negative consequences for objectified women include increasing men's willingness and urge to sexually abuse them and normalization of sexual violence.

3.4 The influence of dominant gender frames in people's decisions and attitudes in daily life.

Framing and cultivation theories were used to examine the influence of dominant gender frames towards people's decisions and attitudes in daily life and its implications towards women. 98% of respondents responded that they think the way women are treated in society directly relates to how they are framed in television and mainly drama series. This is because the more people watch these series, the more they perceive the natural world as they see it on television. This is mainly because these drama series are aired everyday in week days and get repeated in weekends.

80% of male respondents said that they see and perceive women as weak, sex objects, and dependent. Men agreed that women who are home mums and housewives are better comparing to educated women as they can be submissive. They insisted that educated women are a threat towards men because they are opinionated.

Gender frames portrayed in Siri za familia also involved gender violence themes, in which, in most cases, women were the victims. These themes were used to make the story more exciting and make viewers more anxious for the next scene. Gender violence is romanticized, fantasized and glamorized. The implication is that gender violence is normalized and desensitized in the public eye. The more people see it, the more they normalize and promote it. This has become one of the contributing factors in the normalization of gender violence among young viewers.

Continuous exposure and portrayal of gender violence in television series towards women normalize gender violence in real life by making it less dangerous, acceptable and normal in public eye in daily life. This fatherly intensifies gender violence towards women in society.

3.5 Implications of gender frames portrayed in television series towards women.

In reflection to cultivation theory, the implication of gender frames portrayed in television series as findings shows is that, in real life women are treated as weak, needy, and less involved in important decisions because the society sees them as weak and emotional. Women in real life are also viewed and perceived as sex objects and instruments of pleasure, and also gender violence towards women is normalized and with this female respondents said that they are rarely included, in important family decisions, also excluded from owning family resources like land. They also feel that their strength is within their household, especially in domestic activities and not beyond that.

Findings also show that women who are portrayed in Siri za familia are only those with beautiful and attractive physical appearances (Objectification). This implies that it lowers women's confidence in real life. It leads to body image issues and lowers women's self-esteem and confidence. This further causes a lot of women to lose opportunities in life, and they remain poor and dependent. Women also feel pressure to conform to unrealistic beauty standards portrayed in television series, which causes some to opt for plastic surgery or use cosmetics to bleach their skin to feel acceptable and desired, which is dangerous for their health. The frequency of viewing sexualized female gender frames is directly associated with higher acceptance of unhealthy cosmetic uses and also cosmetics surgery.

The psychological impact is that many women in society perceive themselves as powerless; this is mainly because society views them as incapable.

Female respondents agreed that they feel unworthy, less beautiful, powerless, incapable of dealing with life challenges and with low self-esteem. They feel that way because that is how society views them, so sometimes, even when they want to try something new, they get pulled back.

4. CONCLUSION

It is safe to conclude that gender frames portrayed daily in television series are just standard and do not impact society as long as they intend to entertain society. However, these gender frames portrayed in television series have a long-lasting impact on society, especially on women who are always portrayed in a disadvantaged manner. This is primarily because people spend much time watching television series broadcast daily. Reflecting on cultivation theory, the result is that the more people watch these programs, the more they see the real world, just like what they consume from television programs. Today, women are facing a lot of problems stemming from the way they are perceived. Gender violence is desensitized in the public eye due to the fact that it is glamorized in television series women being the main victims. If we want to change the ways women are viewed and perceived in society so as to reduce gender problems, something must be done with the ways gender is framed and portrayed in television programs. Also, society needs to be aware of what they consume from television programs and understand its implications towards the choices they make in life. While this study accepts the contribution of television series in bringing about social change, it remembers the function of television series as entertainment in unequally portraying and framing the female and male genders and its implications. This paper advocates for a more positive portrayal of gender frames in television series; women should be portrayed in a positive light. This will help to reduce gender problems in society by counteracting the negative perception society has towards women.

CONSENT

Not applicable

ETHICAL APPROVAL

Informed agreement was sought to respondents and participation was for the willing respondents only. Also, all information from respondents was kept confidential. The researcher considered ethics every step of the way while conducting this study. All the respondents were treated with respect and dignity while remaining anonymous.

REFERENCES

1. Ahmed, A. (2012). Women and soap operas: Popularity, portrayal and perception. International Journal of Scientific and Research publications, Volume 2, Issue 6. , 1-6.
2. Aromona, O. (2016). Portrayal of African Women in Nollywood Films over a Five-Year Period: A Content Analysis of. East Tennessee: Electronic Theses and Dissertations.
3. Arowolo, S. O. (2017). Understanding Framing Theory, Retrieved March 9, 2023. Available: https://www.researchgate.net/publication/317841096_UNDERSTANDING_FRAMING_THEORY
4. Colin-Thome, J. (2017). The Objectification Of Women In Movies & TV Shows. Retrieved August 2023. Available: <https://prezi.com/sbfcfmukcbyn/the-objectification-of-women-in-movies-amp-tv-shows/>
5. Foutus. (2002). Television situation comedies. Retrieved September 2023, from Female weight, male negative comments, and audience reactions. Sex Roles. Available: <https://mediarepresentation.wordpress.com/>
6. Framing theory. Available :<https://www.researchgate.net/publication>
7. Gebner, G., Gross, L., Morgan, M., & Signorielli, N. (1986) "Living with television: The dynamics of the cultivation process" in J. Bryant & D. Zillman (Eds), Perspectives on media effect
8. Heflick. (2011). From women to objects: Appearance focus, target gender, and perceptions of warmth, morality and competence. Journal of Experimental Social Psychology , 47.
9. Himani, J. (2015). Gender stereotyped Portrayal of Women in the Media: Perception and Impact on Adolescent. Retrieved October 2023, from Semantic Scholar: semanticscholar.org
10. Ibrahim, F. (2017). Portrayal of Women's Images in Television Dramas: A Malaysian Case, SHS Web of Conferences 33, 00063 (2017) (pp. 1-6). Kuala Lumpur: EDP Sciences.
11. Ingham. (2007). The Portrayal of Women on Television. Retrieved September 2023. Available: <http://www.aber.ac.uk/media/Students/hzi9401.html>
12. Khan, M. A. (2011). Portrayal of Women by Star Plus Soap Operas: A Feministic Perspective (January-June, 2010). Pakistan Journal of Social Sciences (PJSS) , 365-378.
13. Kasimoglu, S. (2019). Portrayal of Perception of Women in Domestic Series and its Comparison with the Real-Life Woman's Figure, From Woman's Perspective. The Turkish Online Journal of Education , 70-76.

14. Kaul, S. (2010). Portrayal of Women in Television (TV) Serials. Studies on Home and Community Science , 15-20.
15. Kellie, D., Blake, K., & Brooks, R. (2019). What drives female objectification? An investigation of appearance-based interpersonal perceptions and the objectification of women. PLoS One, 14(8), e0221388.
16. Michael, G. (2023). Television Series definition. Retrieved February 5, 2023, from Law Insider: Available:<https://www.lawinsider.com/dictionary/television-series>
17. Nussbaum, M.C. (2000) Women and Human Development: The Capabilities Approach. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge.
18. Objectification of women by Media | Rights of Equality. Available: <https://www.rightsofequality.com/objectification-and-exploitation-of-girls-and-women-by-the-mass-media-and-the-social-media/>
19. Razkane, H. (2021). The Representation of Women on Moroccan TV. Available: <https://core.ac.uk/download/492986465.pdf>
20. Sen, A. (2011). The role of media and communication. Open Book Publishers.
21. Shrum, L. (2017). Cultivation Theory: Effects and Underlying Processes. Research Gate , 1-12.
22. Stacks, D. W. (2015). Cultivation theory:media effects. Science Direct-International Encyclopedia of the Social & Behavioral Sciences (Second Edition) , 29-34.
23. Soliman, M. (2021). Framing of Female Leading Roles in Drama Series on Video Streaming Platforms. Available: <https://core.ac.uk/download/482647248.pdf>
24. Thabete, F. (2008). Representation of Black African Women's Bodies in the Soap Opera Generations. University of Kwazulu-Natal.
25. Womenite. (2020, September 13). The change makers. Retrieved September 1, 2023, Available:Womenite: https://womenite.com/