Antioxidants protect the body from free radicals that cause oxidative stress. One of the main properties of antioxidants is to prevent or delay cell damage. This means that a diet high in antioxidants may reduce the risk of many diseases, including heart disease and some types of cancer. Many plants have already been studied for their antioxidant properties, and the main classes of natural substances responsible for antioxidant activity have been identified. The studies presented in this manuscript have shown that Dialium guineense fruit may be an effective antioxidant agent. Plant foods are a source of not only vitamins and minerals, but also antioxidants. The quantitative content of biologically active substances that are potential antioxidants has been investigated. The article may be interesting for scientists and journal readers
