Optional/General comments	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> While the paper strongly advocates for political consciousness education, it lacks a critical perspective on the potential challenges or drawbacks of such an approach. It would be beneficial to discuss any potential risks, such as the suppression of alternative viewpoints or the stifling of independent critical thinking, which can sometimes arise in political education programs. Although the paper outlines several challenges faced by vocational college students (e.g., low professional qualifications, scientific and technological gaps), it could benefit from a more nuanced and detailed analysis of these issues. A deeper exploration of the root causes and specific socio-economic factors affecting students' political consciousness would strengthen the argument. The paper would be more convincing if it included empirical evidence, such as surveys or case studies, to demonstrate the current state of political consciousness among vocational college students and the effectiveness of political education programs. This would provide a more data-driven approach to the argument and make the recommendations more credible.
