The study has a great potential (basis) in value addition strategies to the currently commercialized fishery products. Based on the introduction, most sausages are made from surimi products. In the industry, surimi is sourced from low-value fish (cost effective). I am concerned (cost) about using milkfish, which is a high-value fish, in this product development. I hope the authors can provide more insights on why they have chosen milkfish as their main protein source. Or if there is a currently commercialized milkfish sausage, it would be better to mention it in the introduction and then mention on enriching it with seaweeds to improve the nutritional content of the product.

(If not please suggest an alternative title)	Yes (But please include a statement in the introduction mentioning about chorizo Sausage (chorizo in the Philippines) is the outcome of combining appropriate ingredients in precise proportions, alongside a well-defined structure and regulated production methods, with its quality consistently mirroring the condition of the raw materials and the manufacturing process. We want the readers to be familiar with the terms we are using in this study.
