Compulsory REVISION comments	In this retrospective study the Authors assessed the feasibility of the direct push blood transfusion method in newborns. The results deserve further insights and may be useful for similar centers from poor resource settings. The main manuscript limitations, in particular the retrospective nature and the small sample size, have been discussed. Part of the transfused newborns were preterm, it would be interesting to have the gestational age reported, in addition to postnatal age. The transfusion technique has been considered safe, however, further data on monitoring methods and incidence of side effects would be appreciated. English language requires a significant revision, and some typos need correction. For instance, the term "exchange transfusion" is used inappropriately, as it indicates the complete single or double volume blood exchange to treat hyperbilirubinemia or other conditions.
